Claims 21-24 are rejected under 35 U.S.C. 112, second paragraph, as being indefinite for failing to particularly point out and distinctly claim the subject matter which applicant regards as the invention.

The above claims are misdescriptive in referring to the substrates 18 as "planar". The interface itself is planar in configuration; the substrates that comprise the interface are essentially linear in configuration.

The following is a quotation of the appropriate paragraphs of 35 U.S.C. 102 that form the basis for the rejections under this section made in this Office action:

A person shall be entitled to a patent unless –

(b) the invention was patented or described in a printed publication in this or a foreign country or in public use or on sale in this country, more than one year prior to the date of application for patent in the United States.

Claims 21-24 are rejected under 35 U.S.C. 102(b) as being anticipated by Fujimori et al.

See for example Embodiment 10, specifically suggesting "metal foils" being used as fillers; Embodiment 13 (conductive metal foil 61) of Fujimori et al. Note that at least one material suggested for the matrix layers 102 is silicone rubber, which has thermal conductivity comparable to silicone grease, commonly used as a "thermal grease" (see data sheet from the MIT website). No limitation is expressed in the claims regarding the degree of conductivity required of the compliant material. Thus this material fully meets the claim recitation of a "conformable, heat conductive material". Note that the melting point of silicone rubber is well above 51 degrees Celsius.

Regarding the claimed "interposing" and "compressively engaging" steps, it is clear that Fujimori et al. anticipates this notoriously well known method of using a thermal transfer sheet. See for example Figs. 18-19, lines 40-48 of column 7, lines 42-46 of column 8, bridging paragraph of columns 21-22. Indeed, thermal interface sheets are universally compressively engaged when installed between heat sinks and components to ensure adequate surface engagement; the only question is one of the degree of compressive engagement, and whether a permanent pressing force is employed by springs or other means.

The prior art made of record and not relied upon is considered pertinent to applicant's disclosure.

Weixel shows a composite thermal interface pad. The remaining references of record were cited in the parent application.
